

Memory utilisation will be less in array based implementation because of holes. And if we assume constant time for malloc then insertion in dynamic allocation based LL will be constant (insertion in tail basically) and that in array based implementation is also constant because we are certain that we don't need to check for more than 1024 locations. So its upper bound won't be greater than 1024 comparisons.